the past two weeks, General Crocker was compelled to limit the attendance to physicians, experts, and a few representatives of the press. Among the latter who saw him yesterday afternoon was a representative of The Harrhitean, and as he entered the call in which the assassin is confined, the latter advanced suilingly and said: "I min glad to see you, my friend, although you went for me again Saturday." General Crocker remarked that the prisoner should be careful in talking to newspaper men, to which Guiteau quickly replied: 'Oh', this is a clever fellow, but he thought he was doing right. The papers MUST SAY SOMETHING MARD ABOUT ME to please the people." A visiter at this point requested the prisoner to write his autograph, and the complied by writing in a hald, round hand. "Charles Guiteau." "Why do you drop the middle letter J'." esked the gentleman. Guiteau said: "Ever since I entered polities, a year and a half ago, I discarded the middle name, as I thought two names enough for a politician." Mr. E. O. Heele, of the New York Graphic, was entraged in skeiching the assassin and his surroundings, when he turned quickly and askel: "What raper is that far?" Upon being told, he said. "I wanted the Graphic to print a face simile of my address of November 15 to the American people, but it has not been done yet. Say to the publishers that i sent it to Mr. Audrows, their regular correspondent, and world like to have it used." Guiteau was dressed very slovenly yesterday in the suit which he were when he shot the Prededit, but had dise wore when he shot the President, but had dis-arded white shirt, collar, and neckie, and wore noter his vest a red flatinel shirt.
